

WHAT MAKES A GOOD PARENT

BY HADASS ROSENBLATT, AGE 12

What is the meaning of a "good parent"?

There are people who think that to be a "good parent" means to be nice to the child, give him presents and have fun with him.

There are people who think that to be a "good parent" means to be hard with the kid and to educate him.

Are these options contradictory?

I think that a "good parent" needs to combine the two ways and use each one at the right time.

Parents don't need to be too nice to the kids and not too hard with them.

A good parent means that his kid should be his first priority and gives him a personal example.

The most important thing that one needs to be a good parent is to give a lot of love to the child.

This is what the child wants too.

The love needs to come from the heart.

It's not important what the parent does but how and why he does it.

The child's heart feels when the things that his parent does or says come with love, and it doesn't really matter to him if his parent has fun with him or punishes him- if he does it because he loves him!!
